

Once upon a time, in a busy town, lived some helpers in masks.

For grown-ups: Rook Dispatch helps independent masked responders get to emergencies.
This is the story of Release 4.2 and project Jedi Order.

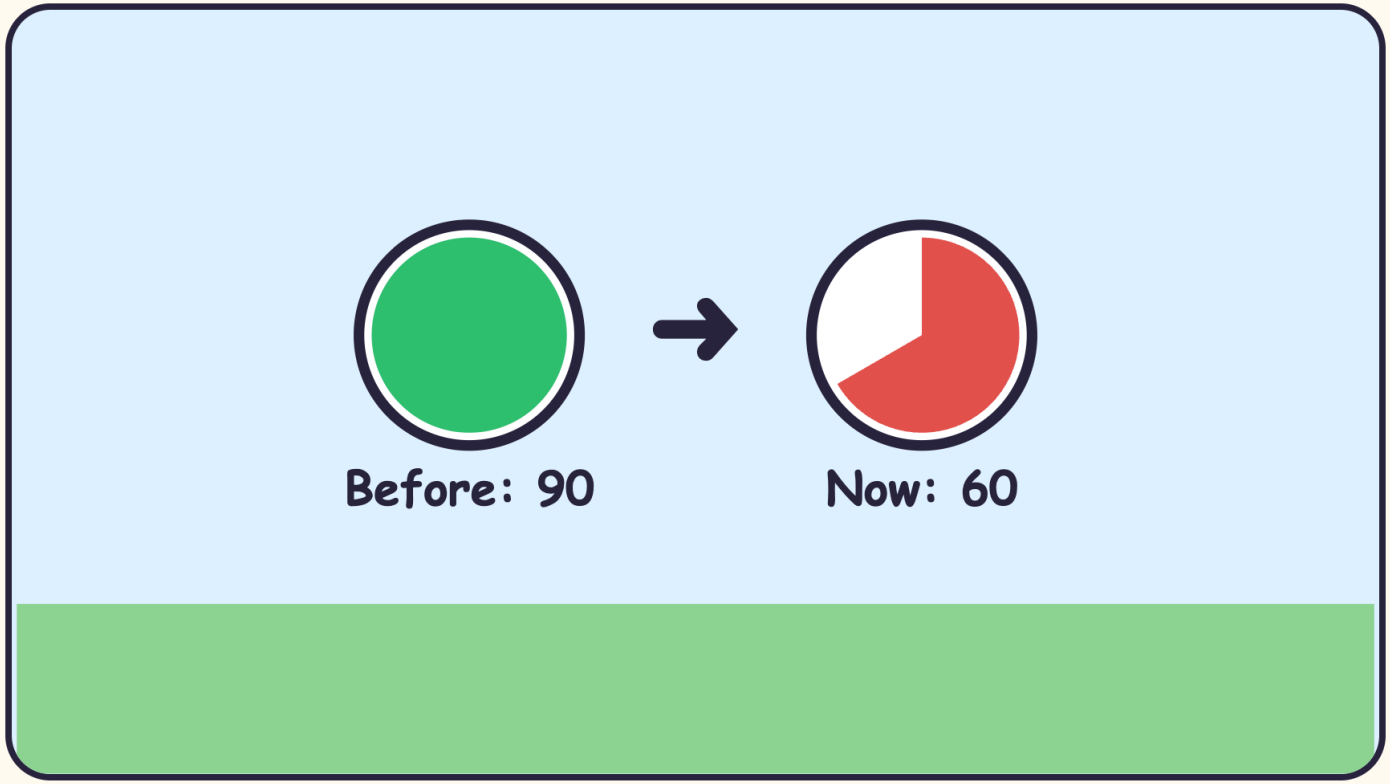

When someone needs help, the Picker robot rings a helper's phone. Ring ring!

For grown-ups: The routing code ranks free responders and pings them one at a time.

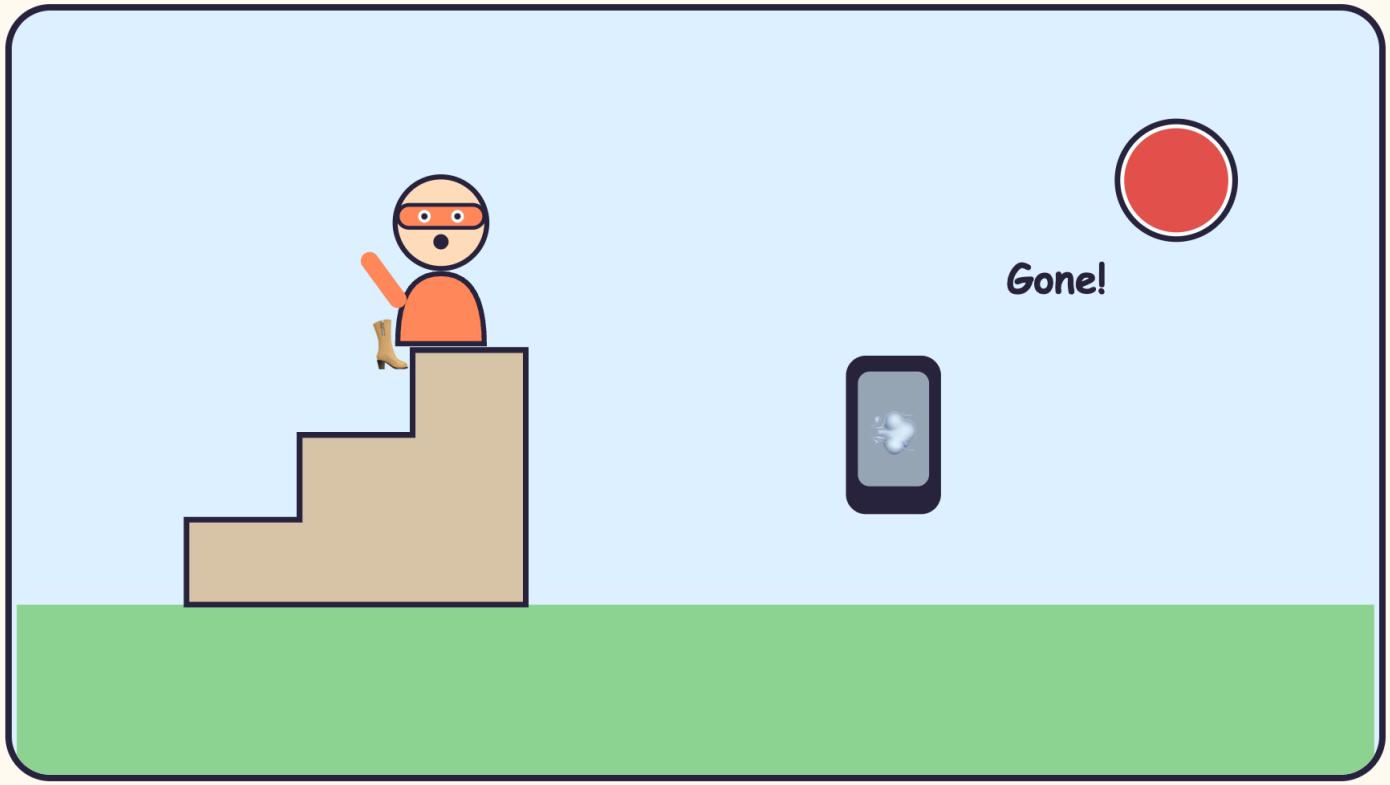

Mite had time to count all the way to 90. Plenty of time! Mite said yes and got a star.

For grown-ups: Before 4.2 the ping wait was 90 seconds. Only about 2 in every 100 pings were missed.

One day, someone made the counting shorter. Only 60!

For grown-ups: Release 4.2 (12 August) cut the ping wait from 90 to 60 seconds.

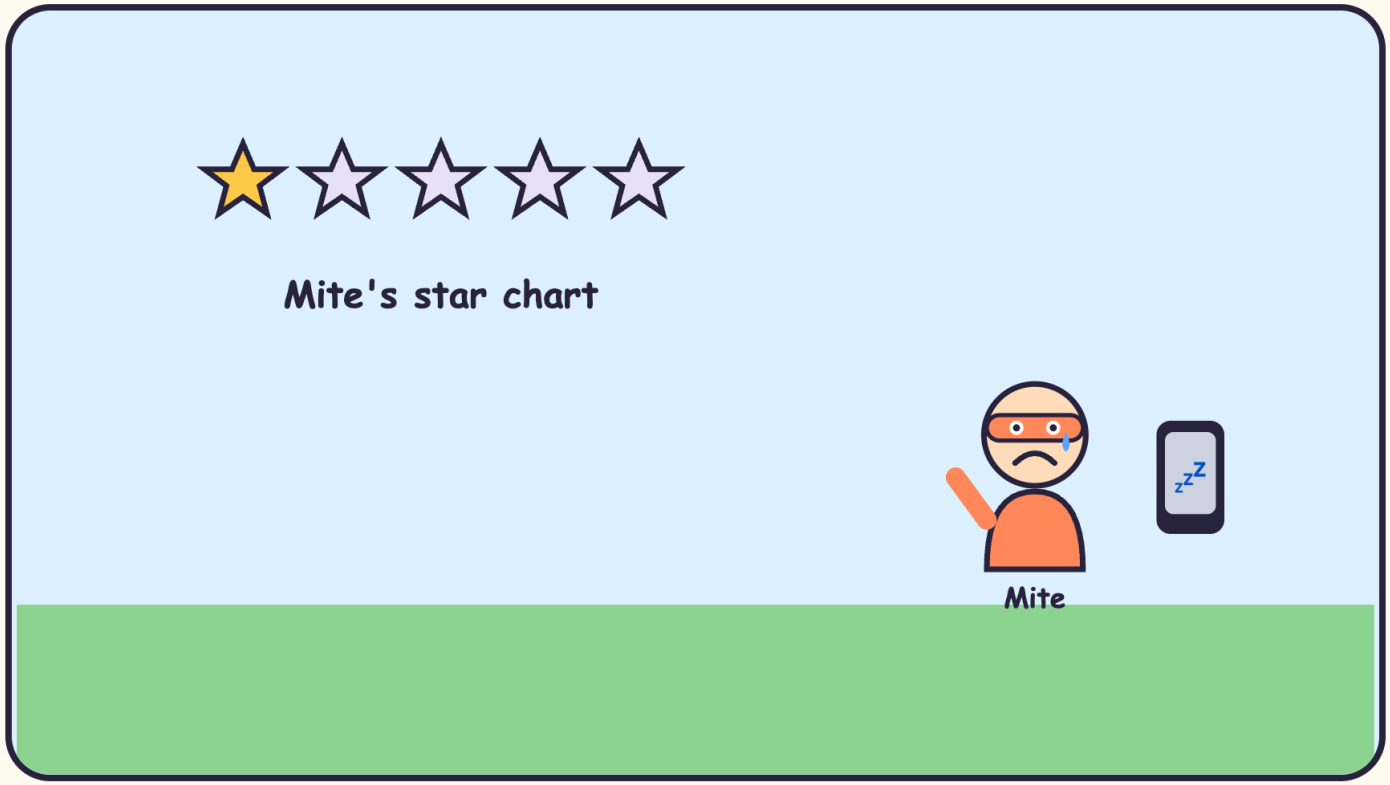

Mite was on the stairs, putting on a boot… by the time Mite grabbed the phone, the ring was gone!

For grown-ups: Some responders need a little over a minute. Missed pings jumped from 2% to 18% on the day 4.2 shipped.

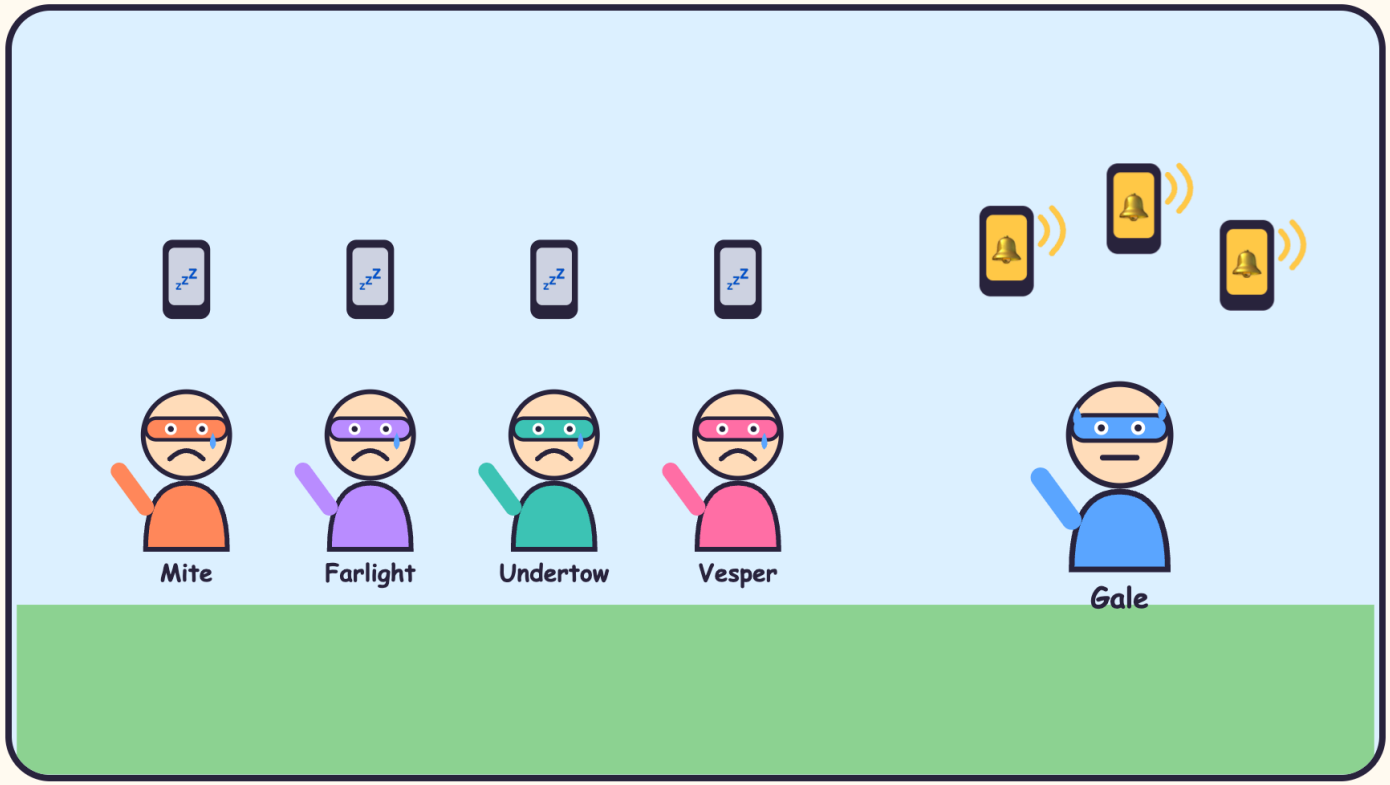

The Picker robot got mixed up. It thought Mite said no, and took away a star.

For grown-ups: The code scores a missed ping exactly like a turned-down one: −0.12. A yes only earns +0.08.

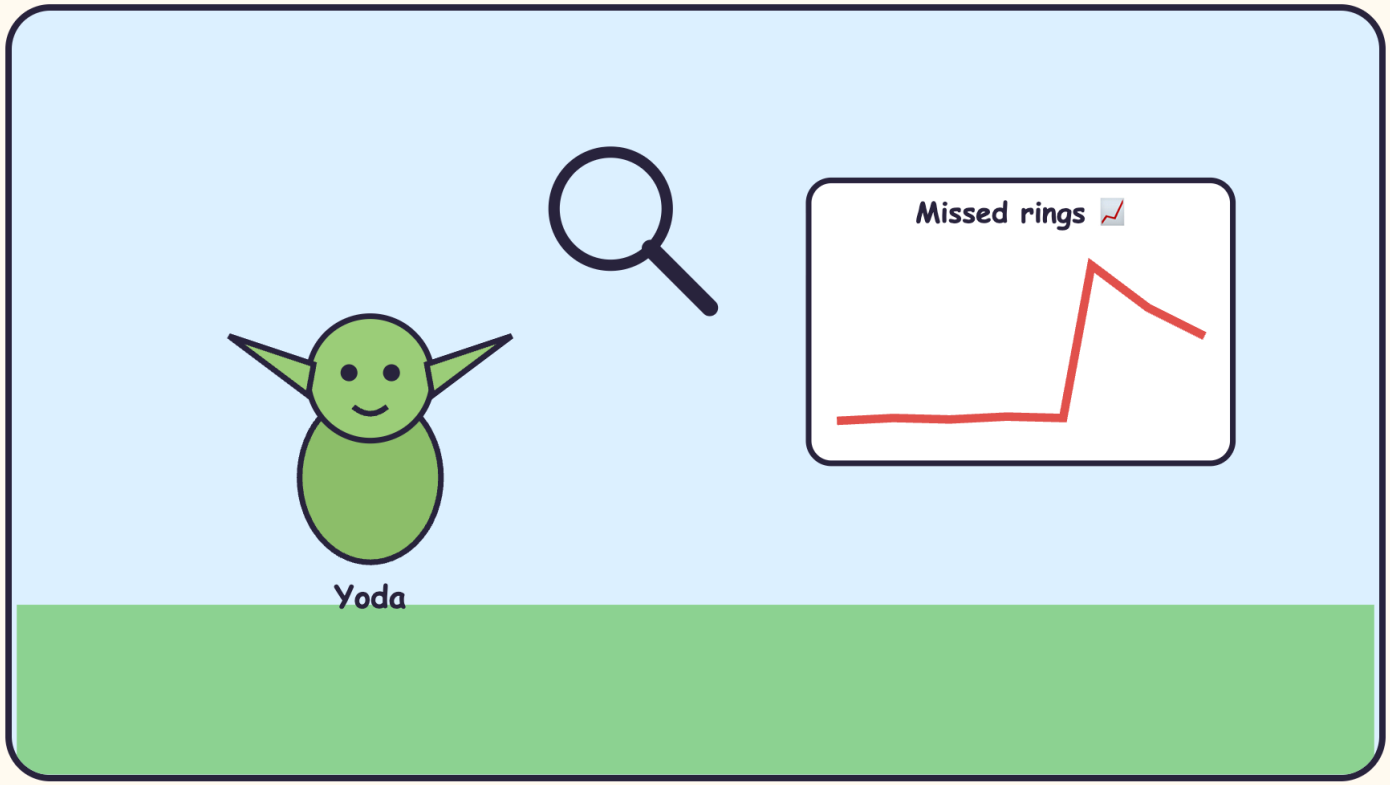

Fewer stars meant fewer rings. And the stars never came back on their own. Mite's phone went quiet.

For grown-ups: The score never recovers over time. A low score means fewer pings, so fewer chances to win it back.

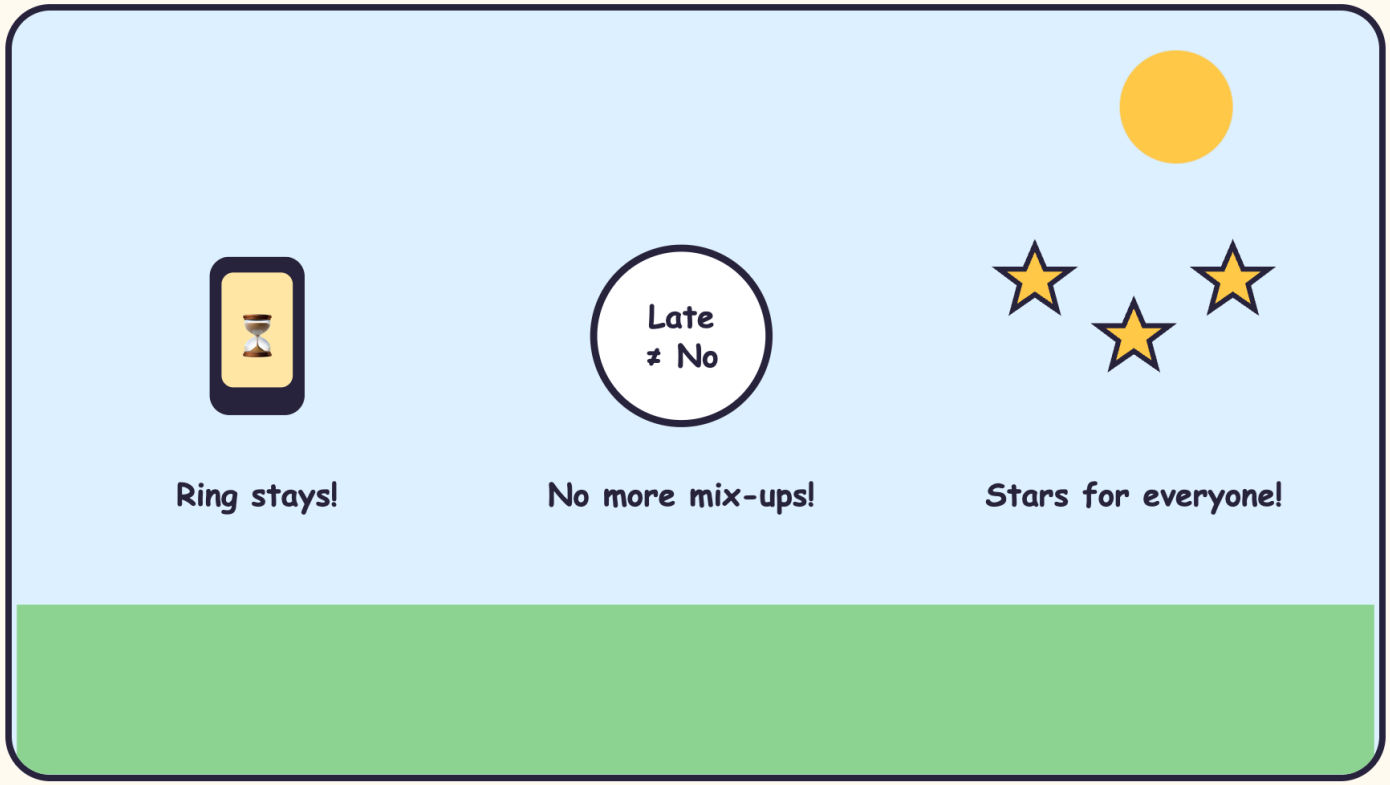

Four helpers stopped getting rings. And Gale got so many rings, Gale got tired!

For grown-ups: Farlight, The Undertow, Vesper and Meteor Mite went from about 12 pings a week to about 1. The Gale went from 13 to 21.

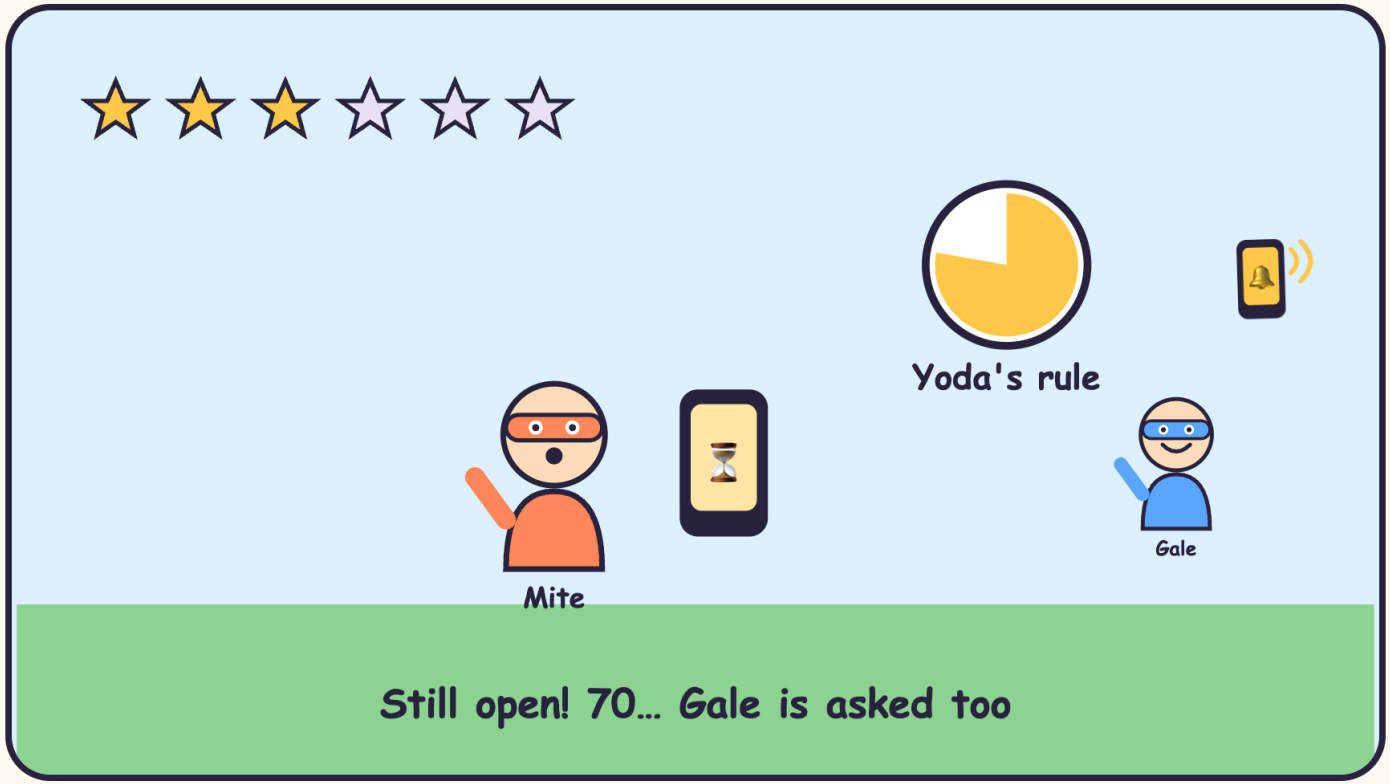

Then Yoda came along, like a detective, and looked at all the clues.

For grown-ups: Six modules of work: the wiki, the tickets and interviews, the pings data, and the routing code.

Yoda's fix: the ring stays a little longer, being late isn't saying no, and everyone gets their stars back!

For grown-ups: The brief: the ping stays open after 60s (first yes wins), a late answer isn't penalized, and every score gets one fresh start.

🔔 Ring Mite

Take!

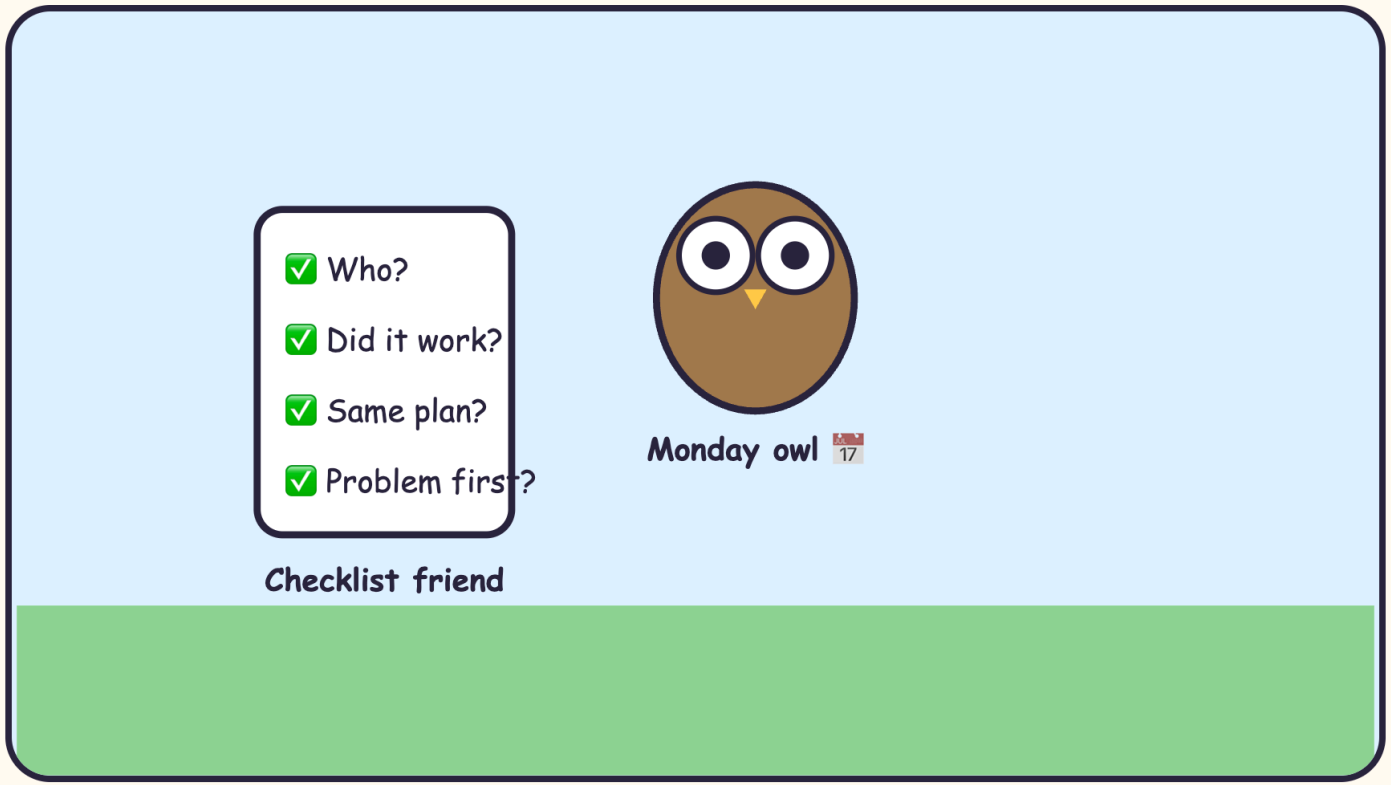

Your turn! Ring ring! Can you help Mite tap Take?

For grown-ups: Try both rules. Old rule: the ring vanishes at 60 and Mite loses a star. Yoda's rule: it stays open, and even a late tap counts.

Kip, who looks after Mite, gets a little note that says why. Mite knows nobody forgot.

For grown-ups: Kip's console gets a quiet-responder alert with the reason. Mite's phone says: your standing has been reset.

Yoda made two helpers: a checklist friend that checks every plan, and a Monday owl that watches the numbers every week.

For grown-ups: The review-checklist and fix-brief skills check every brief before it ships. The weekly-trends skill runs every Monday, and would have flagged 4.2 in week one.

And everyone got rings again,
and nobody was too tired.
The end!

For grown-ups: Next: Helen approves the fix; Wen and Marcus roll it out to one region; the Monday report checks AC1–AC9 until they all pass four weeks in a row.
